

JUDGE T. W. SMITH.

An extract from an address delivered before the Democratic Association at Chicago, by Judge SMITH, at one of its recent sittings.

After having defended at length the policy and measures of the present administration, Mr. S. remarked:

Let us, my fellow citizens, look behind and beyond the "log cabin" scenes of the present hour. In the back ground, in the distant perspective—we may see the standards of all the followers and classes, for whom this bitter and ferocious contest is waged. On them may be seen inscribed, "Assumption of the Payment of the State Debts by the General Government;" "United States Bank, with fifty Millions of Dollars;" "Let Government take care of the rich, and the rich will take care of the poor;" "State Banks, Monopolies, Special Privileges, and Privileged Orders;" "Union of the Whigs for Office." In these will be found the motives for the vast exertions now making; for the prodigality and profusion with which the efforts of the hard cider hand is marked; for the waste and expenditure of millions to obtain the possession and power of the government; for the death-like, convulsive tenacity with which the grasp is made on every thing within its reach, to save a sinking cause, and, amid expiring hope, to stagger on in the last agonizing throes of death, still expecting a victory which cannot be achieved.

Like the great and unfortunate Napoleon, though without his noble and brave spirit, the nearer they approach the hour of their final overthrow, the more desperate and unyielding their efforts.

And, while they affect a composure they do not feel, and boast of success through the ballot-box, what do they, in their spasmodic and unguarded ebullitions which they cannot control, declare? Listen, my countrymen, and know, that what you now hear is more than truth—that it is a reality and is indeed no fiction. (Here Mr. S. read the declarations of Preston, Stockton, Graves, and others, who have threatened civil war and revolution if Harrison is not elected.) These are not the idle declarations of madmen, of fanatic Abolitionists, of wild, inconsiderate men, who have no stake in the country, but the sober, deliberate avowals of men of education, of intelligence, of wealth, many of whom occupy posts of high confidence in the state and federal governments; of men sworn and bound by the most solemn obligation which can bind man to man and to his Creator, to support the Constitution and Government of the country they now solemnly declare they would by force of arms overthrow and destroy. What? Has it come to this? or do we dream? Is it a mere phantom, or illusion of the hour? Alas! it is too true that these men deliberately declare that if the people, those who alone have the right to determine, shall elect a chief magistrate of their choice, and not of the selection or approval of these men, that we shall be visited with civil war, with revolution and overthrow of our happy Government; that our peaceful homes shall be turned into fortresses, and the houses and temples of the living God converted into barracks and hospitals; that fathers shall be compelled to bear arms against their sons, brothers against brothers, and plunge their bristling bayonets into each others' breasts; that the roar of cannon and the clangor of arms shall be heard in our peaceful towns and cities; that their streets shall flow rivers of blood, and our helpless women and children, amidst these frightful scenes of blood and slaughter, flee to the wilds and fastnesses of the forests, to shield them from the phials of wrath and of mad desolation, poured out by the demon spirit of civil discord.

That the parabolic arm of rebellion shall be lifted on high, with the blood-stained weapons which have drunk the life's blood of the fathers of the nation, and flourish the incendiary torch, through the darkness of night rendered dim and flickering by the brighter glare of the bursting flames which it has produced, amid the consuming ruins of the noblest structures which human art could rear.

That the fair fabrics of our noble and proud cities, where now the peaceful seats of science, of arts, and literature exist and flourish; where nature's noblest charities are dispensed, and the mild doctrines of the cross are taught to man, shall be razed to the ground, and their streets converted into vast camps, successively occupied by the contending parties, and haggard famine with her glaring eye balls rolling with ferocious rapine and brutal violence follow in their march, accompanied by disease, desolation, and death.

Let us pause and ask, where is the demon that desires this wide spread scene of horror, of misery, and desolation? who will respond to this fiend-like wish? Is there, can there be one? If there be one, well might we exclaim, "Is there no chosen curse—no hidden thunder red with uncommon wrath, to blast the wretch, who seeks his country's ruin."

Let us throw aside this hateful, blood-stained picture, and hope that God, in his infinite mercy, will avert all such scenes of misery, and direful horror, from our now happy land. Come what may—come weal or woe—let us trust that civil war is destined to remain far—very far, indeed—from our shores. Let us, in charity, believe that the hand that would light the torch of civil war among us, has not been created, or if so, that it has not the courage to strike the fatal blow. Let us conclude that the men, who really intend to plan and execute civil commotion, never proclaim it on the house top. It seeks secrecy—it deals and lives in deep and dark recesses, has hiding places and coverts, and shuns the light of day; it requires pledges and oaths from its followers for their fidelity; it deals in innuendoes and passwords, and so moulds all its operations, that, like a meteor, it bursts suddenly upon you, and affrights by its terrific appearance, and fiery course.

Let us rather believe that these declarations are but the idle, empty, vapouring sounds of men who wish to intimidate the timorous and excite the more daring—that they are otherwise harmless, and are better suited to the auditors of a female abolition society than the political forum. Mr. Van Buren will be re-elected, he will continue to quietly and honestly administer the Government as he has done, and, ten to one, but some of these hotspurs will be found, at no very distant day, loud in praise of his administration, craving, in the most humble terms, some official crumbs from the administration table. That there can be no ground of opposition to him personally, or for want of talents, sound doctrine, or integrity of purpose, is most manifest, and his opponents have furnished the most satisfactory and conclusive evidence of this truth.

In 1839 the whole opposition, with the exception of one vote in the Senate and not a much greater number in the House, agreed to, and by an act of Congress, placed at his disposal 10 millions of dollars and 50,000 soldiers, to be used at his discretion, in relation to the disputed boundary in Maine, as the exigencies of the times might in his judgment require. The peace of the country, its future prosperity, the lives of thousands of human beings, and the hopes and destiny of millions of freemen, were confided to the power and discretion of one man. Nobly and faithfully did he perform the trust—the results known—it is matter of history.

The honor of the country was defended, its peace preserved, and its rights protected from encroachment. What a proud tribute was paid by the passage of this law to Mr. Van Buren! The opponents of the present administration, in justification of all their idle and ridiculous parades and prodigality, plead, most unjustly, an alleged example during the canvass which elevated Gen. Jackson to the Presidency, forgetting the vast and incomparable difference between the man they profess to so highly admire, and the soldier and patriot the people love and regard for his noble military achievements and wise civil administration of the Government.

They say, in affected delight, that they have stolen the bugle by which the clans of Old Hickory were aroused from their remote and deepest glens, and marshalled on the field; and so they hope to arouse the wardens and followers of old Tip and Tyler, and march to victory. If they have stolen the Jackson bugle, of which we know nothing, of one thing we are certain, that they have not the Jackson bugler in their ranks. Their musician is an imposture, and knows not the note to which freemen respond and recognise as the war cry under which they must.

The same bugler who sounded the notes of Jackson's victory at New Orleans, now raises the loud cry of preparation along the mountains and hills, the streams and valleys of this republic; and the shrill notes will reach each ear and animate each breast in our ranks, and lead them to a great and glorious civil victory, which shall preserve the nation in peace, prosperity and honor, protecting alike the just rights of all. This done, each will receive a patriot's best reward—the nation's thanks.
